When I moved to Auburn, I knew no one in the school, city, or state. With zero ties to the university, I stumbled around social circles trying to find any way to make friends. I joined the Apparel Merchandising and Design Association with this in mind. This club brought mentors, plans, events, and support when I was in desperate need of it. Then, I began taking core classes like Nutrition and Global Studies, which gave me close friends unrelated to my own major. In my lectures, I recognized faces and formed groups. In the halls of Spidle, teachers and peers recognized and reached out to me. Because of my growing love for the college, I joined the Student Ambassadors my sophomore year and have been part of it ever since. I've learned about the student organizations, diverse programs, study abroad, and valuable staff members that make CHS so special. Now knowing these resources, I want to make them available to our student body.

The College of Human Sciences is a small college and for that is often overlooked. But, with that small size it offers immediate connection. CHS fosters not only career development but also personal development. The majors housed, the organizations created, and the students enrolled in the College of Human Sciences all enforce the mission to create a better future through the science of the quality of life. As School's Council President, I hope to give students in all programs the resources they need to succeed and connect. Covid-19 has especially changed our college due to its size and the new capacity limits. It's moved most students out of Spidle hall and onto Zoom. Because of this, I hope to create new initiatives across student organizations and with staff guidance that encourage students from different majors to meet virtually and work together. With broader connections comes a better understanding of our world and possible future careers. This allows members of the College of Human Sciences ample opportunity to grow not just academically but also personally. Since this is a dual position that includes assuming the Presidency of the student ambassador program, it is also my goal to get the student ambassador program more involved in the events of the college as well as in the lives of individuals to help achieve this mission. With this role, I don't want to change our College, but amplify its impact.
